

Today, at the invitation of the Henry Jackson Society think tank, President Ilves visited the House of Commons of the British Parliament, where he gave a presentation to Members of Parliament, policy makers and opinion leaders about cyber defence and more broadly about the challenges a country must face in the 21st century. At the parliament, the discussion was headed by one of the best-known experts in cyber security and security policy, Baroness Pauline Neville-Jones.

The Henry Jackson Society is a British think tank named after the US Senator Henry Jackson, who supported humane and democratic values in his homeland and also a forceful foreign policy of unconditionally defending democratic values. The think tank analyses foreign policy based on these values.
